REPORT HIGHLIGHTS

Inertial Measurement Unit (IMU) refers to a system with three mutually orthogonal gyros and accelerometers. The IMU industry in the field of aerospace is very mature, but as MEMS and quartz technologies move toward higher performance they are finding their way into these markets. The road is long before these technologies will enter in direct competition, but new uses and new applications are emerging from these advances.

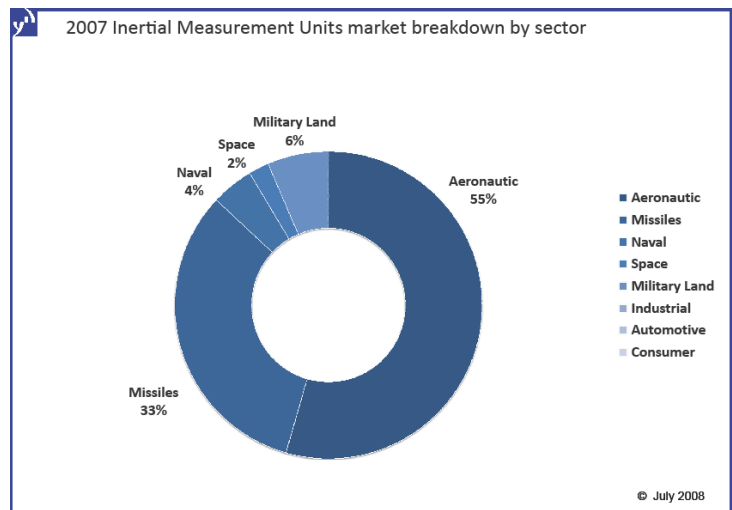

The decline of mechanical accelerometers such as DTGs creates interesting business opportunities for other IMU system technologies. FOG, HRG (or other resonant devices), and MEMS technologies are good substitute solutions. The market opportunity comes both from new applications as well as the replacement market for aerospace and defense systems.

New applications are increasing in both high performance markets and low performance consumer markets. Sensors clusters are already integrating 4DOF to 5DOF solutions in gaming and handheld GPS products for example.

Customers are currently requesting 6DOF for selected applications and the demand is only starting. The challenges to build these consumer IMUs are very high and only a handful of players will manage to provide the appropriate solution.

The key question in this field is currently: which partnerships will form to provide processing and appropriate packaging solutions to the hundreds of medium to low volume customers? Opportunities are wide open in this field in the next 3 years.

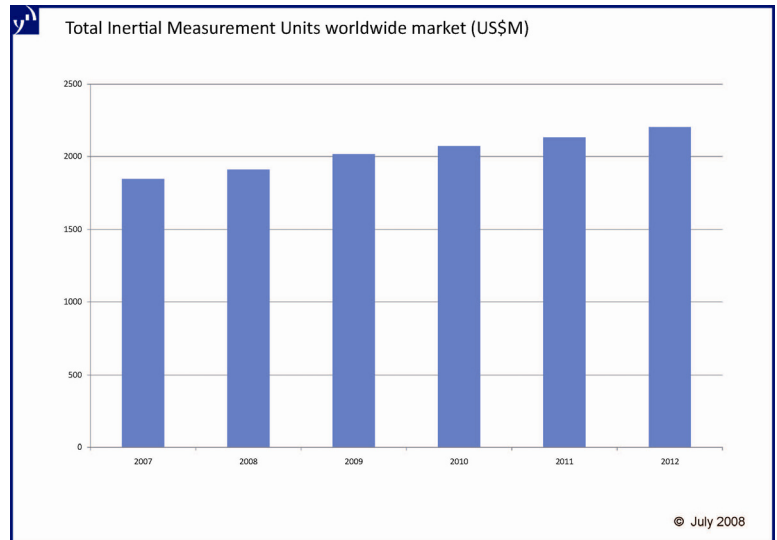

The complexity of the IMU industry requires a complex monitoring of the market. As industry leaders are monitoring the MEMS and other miniaturized quartz technologies advances, challengers are evaluating the market opportunity of new applications and potential replacement of older systems.

Yole's market report provides a global and in depth market overview of the IMU industry and a description of the leading players.

Yole estimates the 2007 IMU market to represent 1,85 B$.

The market is mainly dominated by aircraft and missiles applications. The overall growth rate is limited to single digit growth but selected applications are expected to experience a significant growth.
